

Early Journal Content on JSTOR, Free to Anyone in the World

This article is one of nearly 500,000 scholarly works digitized and made freely available to everyone in the world by JSTOR.

Known as the Early Journal Content, this set of works include research articles, news, letters, and other writings published in more than 200 of the oldest leading academic journals. The works date from the mid-seventeenth to the early twentieth centuries.

We encourage people to read and share the Early Journal Content openly and to tell others that this resource exists. People may post this content online or redistribute in any way for non-commercial purposes.

Read more about Early Journal Content at <http://about.jstor.org/participate-jstor/individuals/early-journal-content>.

JSTOR is a digital library of academic journals, books, and primary source objects. JSTOR helps people discover, use, and build upon a wide range of content through a powerful research and teaching platform, and preserves this content for future generations. JSTOR is part of ITHAKA, a not-for-profit organization that also includes Ithaka S+R and Portico. For more information about JSTOR, please contact support@jstor.org.

VIRGINIA DEVELOPMENT CO. V. RICH PATCH IRON CO.*

Supreme Court of Appeals: At Richmond.

November 22, 1900.

1. BILLS OF EXCEPTION—Signing after adjournment of term. After final judgment at law and the adjournment of the term, the judge of the court has no power to sign bills of exception to rulings made during the trial, although it be done by agreement of counsel and by leave of the court entered of record during the term. Such bills are no part of the record, and the fact that they were signed in vacation appearing in the record here, this Court will take notice of it ex mero motu.
2. BILLS OF EXCEPTION—Signing after term—How leave reserved. In order to give to a court at a subsequent term authority to sign a bill of exception in a case tried at a previous term, some control must be reserved over the case by the court during the term of trial, as by failure to enter judgment, or entering a motion for a new trial and continuing it until the next term, or by leave reserved to sign a bill of exception on or before a particular day of the next term, and the presentation of the bill for signature in accordance with the terms of the leave reserved.

Error to a judgment of the Circuit Court of Alleghany county, rendered September 1, 1899, in an action of assumpsit, wherein the plaintiff in error was the plaintiff, and the defendant in error was the defendant.

Affirmed.

The opinion states the case.

Phlegar & Johnson,† E. M. Pendleton and W. B. Kegley, for the plaintiff in error.

R. L. Parrish & Son, for the defendant in error.

KEITH, P., delivered the opinion of the court.

The final order in this case shows that the jury returned the following verdict:

"We the jury upon the issue joined, find for the defendant in the sum of $1,754.81, with legal interest thereon from the 15th day of October, 1897, until paid."

Thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant it a new trial on the ground that it was contrary to the law and

---

* Reported by M. P. Burks, State Reporter.

† By request of his associate counsel, the statement is made that Judge Phlegar was not of counsel in the lower court.

the evidence, which motion the court overruled, "to which ruling of the court, overruling its motion to set aside the verdict of the jury, and grant it a new trial, as well as to sundry rulings of the court upon the trial of the cause, the plaintiff excepts; and by agreement of counsel, and for reasons appearing to the court, leave is hereby given the plaintiff to file bills of exception within sixty days from the rising of the court—such bills to have the same effect as if signed, sealed, enrolled and filed during the present term. Whereupon it is considered by the court that the defendant recover against the plaintiff the sum of seventeen hundred and fifty-four dollars and eighty-one cents ($1754.81), with legal interest thereon from the 15th day of October, 1897, until paid, and its costs by it in this behalf expended."

The following order entered in vacation on the 16th day of October, 1899, appears in the record:

"Virginia Development Company v. Rich Patch Iron Company. This day came the parties by counsel, and the plaintiff tendered its five bills of exceptions, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, and by consent of parties they are signed and made a part of this record.

"The clerk of the Circuit Court of Alleghany county, will enter this order in his law order book.

S. H. LETCHER.

The bills of exceptions referred to in the foregoing order are as follows: "

Then come in order the several bills of exceptions so signed by the Judge in vacation.

The first question which presents itself for our consideration is, can bills of exceptions be signed by the Judge of a court in which a trial at common law takes place after the court has adjourned?

No exception or objection to the consideration of the bills of exceptions appearing in the record has been made by counsel, but as the record discloses the fact that the bills of exceptions were signed in vacation, it presents for consideration a question which goes to the root of our jurisdiction, and is therefore one which it is our duty to decide before proceeding further in the case.

It appears that a final judgment was entered and that the court adjourned without having signed, and made part of the record, bills of exceptions taken to the rulings made during the progress of the trial. No control over the judgment is reserved in the judgment. It is final and complete, unless power to add to the record is conferred upon the Judge in vacation by the following language embodied in the order: "By agreement of counsel and for reasons appearing to the court, leave is hereby given the plaintiff to file bills of exception within 60 days from the rising of the court, such bills to have the same effect as if signed, sealed, enrolled and filed during the present term."

The subject of signing bills of exceptions has been carefully considered in this court in several cases, and the principles by which we are to be guided seem to be well settled.

In Winston v. Giles, 27 Gratt. 530, it appears that the plaintiff excepted to the opinion of the court given against him upon the trial of the cause, and leave was given him until the first day of the next term to file his bills of exception. During the following term, and after the first day thereof, bills of exception which appear to have correctly stated the evidence were presented to the court, but the defendant by his counsel objected to the signing of them on the ground that the record was closed and that the court had no power to re-open the same, which objection of the defendant being maturely considered, was sustained, and the court refused to sign the said bill; the court certifying "that the judgment to which the plaintiff excepts was rendered on Saturday, December 23, 1871; that the court finally adjourned for that term on December 27, 1871, and did not sit upon December 25, 1871; that the present term of this court began on the 5th day of February 1871, and that the bill of exceptions, now tendered for signature was handed to defendant's counsel some two weeks before this date."

The court in that case considered the following propositions: "Can a bill of exceptions to an opinion of the court given on the trial of the cause be signed by the court after the end of the term during which final judgment is rendered in the cause; at least, unless the parties to the cause consent to such signature? And secondly, if that can be done at all, and a day is named by the court in a succeeding term for tendering and signing such a bill, which, however, is not accordingly tendered, and of course is not signed on that day and no notice is then taken of the matter, must the court sign a bill tendered on a later day of the term, even though such bill correctly state the facts of the case and the opinion of the court, to which the exception applies?" It was held that "in the absence of any special statute, or any authoritative decision or settled and established practice on the subject, such as exists in some other states, a bill of exceptions to an opinion given by the court on the trial of a cause ought to be rendered at least before the end of the term during which the final judgment in the cause is rendered. A bill of exceptions, when duly tendered and signed, becomes a part of the record in the cause, and cannot therefore be properly or regularly added to the record of a cause after that cause is ended by final judgment therein, and after the power of the court over it is ended by the close of the term of the court, during which the judgment is rendered. The rule at common law is, that during the term wherein any judicial act is done, the record remains in the breast of the judges of the court and in their remembrance, and therefore the roll is alterable during that term as the judges shall direct ; but when that term is past, then the record is in the roll and admits of no alteration, averment or proof to the contrary."

The principle established by that case and that of Telegraph Co. v. Hobson, 15 Gratt. 122, is that exception should be taken at the time when the ruling is made, so as to give notice of it to the adverse party, and "that, on being properly taken at the time, a formal bill of exceptions may be drawn up and tendered by the exceptant at such time afterwards, during the same term, as may be prescribed or allowed by the court. Convenience seems to require this measure of indulgence, but does not seem to require more, and to give more would create dangers and difficulties, which are obvious, and ought to be avoided if possible without encountering greater evils."

The opinion in Winston v. Giles goes on to show that the power of a court to sign bills of exception and make the facts therein stated a part of the record is not derived from the common law, but is of statutory origin. Our statute upon the subject was taken from that of Westminster 2, 13 Ed. 1, chap. 31, and it has "continued upon our statute book in the same quaint language, which, by successive changes in our judicial system, had become very awkward, and to some extent unintelligible, down to the period of our revision in 1849, when it was materially modified and curtailed by the revisors, and the law as it now stands in our Code was recommended by them and adopted by the legislature. There is nothing in the law as it stood in the Code of 1819, which seems to afford any warrant for the idea, that it authorized a bill of exception to be tendered to the court after the end of the term at which the judgment complained of was rendered. It is said that the law prescribed no period for tendering the bill, which might therefore be tendered at any convenient time. But the very nature of the case implied that the bill should be tendered at the same time, or at least during the same term, at which the judgment was rendered. The bill was to be a part of the record, which would be unalterable and unamendable by the same court, except for a clerical error, after the end of the term. It was therefore unnecessary expressly to name what was so plainly implied. We think that the early and leading case of Wright v. Sharp, 1 Salk. R. 288, decided by Lord Chief Justice Holt, shows that this was the then construction of the statute. But if there could be any doubt about the construction of that statute, there ought, we think, to be none in the construction of the law as it now stands in the Code. The words of it are : ' In the trial of a case at law in which an appeal, writ of error or superseas lies to a higher court, a party may except to any opinion of the court and tender a bill of exceptions, which (if the truth of the case be fairly stated therein) the judge or justices, or the greater part of those present, shall sign; and it shall be a part of the record of the case.' In the trial of a case a party may except and tender his bill of exceptions. Not after the trial, and at another and different term, after the case had been ended. The trial may be considered as lasting during the term at which it occurred for the purpose of completing the record by signing bills of exception in the case, but not during a succeeding term."

The case from which we have quoted so extensively establishes beyond controversy that the power under consideration is of statutory origin, and that by the terms of our statute it could not be exercised after the end of the term at which a final judgment was rendered; that in order to give to a court at a subsequent term authority to add to the record by signing a bill of exception, some control must be reserved over the case by the court in term, as by failure to enter a judgment, by entering a motion for a new trial and continuing it until the next term, or by leave reserved to sign a bill of exception on or before a particular day of the next term, and the presentation of the bill of exception for signature in accordance with the terms of the leave reserved.

In Cromwell v. Moses, 78 Va. 673, it is said that bills of exception "cannot be properly or regularly added to the record of a case after that case has been ended by a final judgment rendered therein, and the power of the court over the record has terminated by the close of the court in which the trial is had, is a matter now generally understood."

In Hudgins v. Simon, 94 Va. 659, this subject was considered by this court, the authorities reviewed, and it was held that "where points are saved during the progress of the trial of an action at law, the formal bills of exception may be written out and signed at the term at which the judgment is rendered, although that be after the term at which the verdict was rendered."

The signing of bills of exception so as to make them a part of the record is a judicial act, and such a judicial act as the court itself was powerless to perform even during the term at which the judgment was rendered, or at any time. The power of a court to do so, as we have seen, is derived from and is measured by the statute, and neither in Telegraph Co. v. Hobson, nor in Winston v. Giles, supra, where this subject is so exhaustively considered, is there a suggestion that the judge in vacation is within the letter or spirit of the statute, or that by consent he could be clothed with power to add to the record in a case which had been closed by a final judgment.

From what source is the power to do so derived? Not from the statute, for the statute, as is shown in Winston v. Giles, contemplates that the signature of the judge shall be affixed during the trial; not by virtue of any vigor imparted to it by leave emanating from the court, for it will hardly be contended that the court can delegate the exercise of any of its functions to an individual, and the judge in vacation is no more the court, except as to such powers as are expressly conferred upon him by statute, than any other citizen; not by consent of parties, for consent of parties does not confer jurisdiction.

In Tyson v. Glaize, 23 Gratt. 799, it is held that a circuit court has no authority to make a decree or render a judgment in vacation, except such decrees and orders as are authorized by statute, and the consent of parties cannot give jurisdiction.

That was a case in chancery which coming on to be heard during a term of the court, it was by consent of parties ordered that the cause be submitted to the court, and that its decision should be entered in vacation as of the last day of the term.

Here we have the consent of the parties, and the decree of the court conferring upon the judge in vacation authority to enter a decree in chancery, and we have the unanimous opinion of this court, "that judges have no jurisdiction to perform any judicial function in vacation except where the power is expressly conferred, as to grant injunctions and appeals, to hear motions to dissolve injunctions, to direct accounts, and to perform such other functions as are expressly authorized by law. And no power being conferred by statute, when the decree in this cause was entered, to pronounce and enter decrees in vacation, and consent of parties or their counsel not giving jurisdiction, the court is of opinion that the order made in the cause, directing the decree to be made and entered in vacation, was erroneous; and that the supposed final decree made and entered in pursuance of such order, is not the decree of the court."

It appears that in the case of Davis v. Poland, 92 Va. 225, the bills of exception were signed in vacation, as was done in the case before us; that a writ of error was awarded, and that case heard and reversed in this court.

A uniform and long-continued practice is entitled to much consideration. As was said in Brown v. Epps, 91 Va. 729: "Where it appears that courts of all grades in the State, from justices of the peace to this court, have gone on uninterruptedly for many years to exercise jurisdiction under a statute, and that during all that time there has been no doubt entertained nor question raised as to the constitutionality of the law—when all this has been done in the presence of an able and inquisitive bar—a strong presumption is raised that the attack has not been made upon the constitutionality of the law, because, in the judgment of the courts and of the profession, no such ground of objection existed."

Courts must rely upon the intelligent scrutiny by counsel of the records under investigation to call attention to errors committed, or to any departure or deviation from established modes of procedure. In the case at bar, and in that cited, the court was deprived of this most essential aid to the administration of justice. Counsel were precluded by previous arrangement from making objection to the manner in which the bills of exceptions in the case cited from 92 Va. were authenticated, and in that case it escaped the attention of the court. But apart from all this, the fact that bills of exception have been signed in vacation in one county, or even though it should be made to appear that it had been done in other counties, cannot be deemed to have established a practice that would overcome the plain and positive decisions of this court upon the law. While, therefore, it is a matter of regret that our attention was not sooner directed to the question, our conclusion cannot be influenced by the fact that in other cases under the circumstances disclosed we failed to discover a defect which we are constrained to hold in this case is fatal.

We have been forced to the conclusion that the leave of court to that end, reinforced by consent of parties, cannot confer authority upon the judge in vacation to sign a bill of exceptions and make it a part of the record. Regarding it as a jurisdictional question, we have felt it our duty to examine and decide it, though not presented to us by counsel and though in contravention of the agreement among them.

The course of procedure is established by law, and it is our duty to see that it is observed until the legislature in its wisdom shall see fit to change that course of procedure by statute. It is not a question of expediency. It is a question of power, and is with regret that we have reached the conclusion that the bills of exception copied into the record are not properly authenticated and cannot be considered.

No error appearing in the record the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed. Affirmed.

NOTE.—The single point decided in this case is, that a bill of exceptions cannot be signed in vacation, even by consent of parties—and if the fact that it was so signed appear on the record, the appellate court will of its own motion refuse to consider it.

The ruling is of vital interest in those circuits where such a custom has prevailed.

The power to sign such bills in vacation is extremely convenient, particularly in the circuit courts which meet but two or three times a year—and no reason is perceived why the necessary authority should not be conferred on the judges of those courts by statute.

There will doubtless be diversity of professional opinion as to the correctness of the decision, in view of the consent feature present in the case, and the effect of consent as taking away error, expressed in the maxim modus et conventio vincunt legem.

The decision really turns upon the question whether the error was jurisdictional or not. Consent may waive error, but it cannot confer jurisdiction inherently lacking. The appellate court holds that the error was jurisdictional. But as the lower court had complete jurisdiction of the subject matter, and as the signing of the bill of exceptions was merely a part of the procedure in the cause—a step which, if the court had refused to take at the proper time and in the proper way, the judge might have been compelled to take in vacation, by madamus (Collins v. Christian, 92 Va. 73, 2 Va. Law Reg. 103, and note by Judge Burks)—there is much room for argument contra.

We are much impressed, however, with President Keith's strong presentation, and the authorities supporting it, and are not prepared to dissent from the conclusion announced.

It should be noted that the court does not disapprove, but on the contrary sanctions, the practice of continuing the cause until the next term, in order that the bills of exception may be prepared—the record thus indicating that no final judgment has been entered, but that the court still retains control of the cause.